Sergi Rugrand/SOPA Images/LightRocket/Getty Images The most common symptoms of coronavirus include a dry cough and fever that can be accompanied by shortness of breath. However, other symptoms such as loss of sense of smell or taste, runny nose, gastrointestinal disorders such as diarrhoea and sore throat have also been reported. If you experience any of these symptoms, it is important to contact your doctor immediately. However, bear in mind that your doctor will probably want to discuss your symptoms with you and ask more questions via tele-health appointments. If your doctor assesses that it's necessary, he or she can guide you where to go to get the test for COVID-19. If there is any breathing problem at any time, it is important that you go to an emergency medical facility immediately, as this particular symptom requires immediate medical attention. Because coronavirus is transmitted through respiratory drops or touching something that the infected person has touched, you may not immediately know that you have been exposed to coronavirus. Incubation period - how long does it take for symptoms to show up after exposure? for COVID-19 is anywhere from two to 14 days. A new study shows that the average (median) time for symptoms occurs is about five days after exposure. If they think you've been exposed, you should stay in quarantine - which means it has no exposure at all to anyone! - reduce the risk of infectious others for 14 days. If you live with others, you should be quarantined in a separate part of your home, and all other areas in which you entered should be thoroughly rehabilitated. Based on the data taken from previous data - with each patient different - patients quickly recover from mild cases of coronavirus within about two weeks. The estimated recovery time for more severe or life-threatening cases is up to three to six weeks. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) defines recovery from coronavirus as the absence of fever-free medications to reduce fever for three full days, as well as improvements to other symptoms, such as cough and shortness of breath, for up to a week. Two negative tests on the dressing are required before the patient can return to work or leave quarantine. It is important that many patients who have recovered continue to be positive after their symptoms have recovered. Researchers are unsure if this is due to antibodies, other infections or further mild infections. Simona Granati/Corbis/Getty Images In order to prevent coronavirus infection, precautions should be taken, such as inviting social measures, frequent hand washing and other precautions. The CDC recommends that people stay 2 feet more apart when they are in public and that people leave their houses only because of essential needs such as grocery shopping or emergencies. When shopping for groceries, it is wise to thoroughly clean the items you take home and hands while you're in the store. If you wear gloves, remove them and remove them as soon as you leave the store to avoid cross-contamination of keys, vehicles, etc. Coronary artery can live on surfaces, depending on the material, from anywhere from a few hours to a few days. As soon as you return home, wash your hands with soap and water for 20 seconds or more using the appropriate handling technique. Avoid touching your eyes, nose and mouth when you're outside and even when you're at home. If you have touched an infected object and accidentally touched your eyes, nose or mouth, the infection has a much higher chance of flying into your system. Venue, music, cake, dress, flowers, food, photographer: Weddings require a lot of planning, especially if you're doing it yourself on a budget. For about a year, I had to make lists that were running through my head: announcements, drone, ornaments, travel plans... When the coronavirus pandemic began, our marriage was more than eight months away. As the United States can boast the best research facilities and health innovations in the world, we thought that eight months would be more than enough time to collect and eradicate the new deadly virus. So we kept planning our wedding and our honeymoon. About three months after the wedding, the airlines canceled our honeymoon tickets. We softened it. International travel probably wasn't a good idea until 2021. Instead of saving the pandemic, the city where we were going to hold the wedding was experiencing a wave of new cases. After months of working from home, eating home-cooked meals and rocking an aesthetic face mask, there was a blow to the stomach that saw others being propagation of public safety proposals. It was also around the same time when rsvp started to switch from Absolutely, I can't wait to see it all! On: So, so, so sorry, but not wise to see anyone. Autoimmune disorders, cancer treatment, pregnancy, surgery... there were so many (absolutely valid, given the pandemic) reasons that guests had to cancel. For me, the hardest phone call from my girlfriend, who is absent from a law school, was asking her to sign a contract banning her from leaving the country in the fall semester, with a sentence of expulsion and the possibility of sitting on a bar exam. Ever. That meant she couldn't come home during the holidays, and she certainly couldn't attend my wedding. On the same day I received this phone call, I received another cancellation, which was the last straw: One of my guests got a COVID-19. It's unusually easy to break up a wedding. After months of making menus and rearranging floor plans, all it takes is an email to say, No matter, 2020 is not our year, Ctrl+Z. What's our 2020 wedding look like? It's going to be great. A chapel with a total of 10 people (which is less than it seems: me, my fiance, the worker, our parents and three of our five brothers) and a connection so that we can have dozens of guests who are supposed to be there, instead watching us get married from the comfort of their couches. It is a jenga tower of difficult decisions, as even the most cruelly defended wedding you could have imagined was still too big to be able to limit the size of the collection. How much can we remove from the wedding and still have it as a wedding? I'm not alone in making these difficult decisions this year. At least two of my bachelor's programming peers (whom I know now!) had to adopt 10 guests this year plus a video link to the wedding model. On the one hand, there's a marriage of two who promise a lifelong promise. On the other hand, it means a lot to celebrate both the current event with friends and family, and the removal of this component a lot exciting from the occasion. Canceling a wedding ceremony is very upsetting. But canceling these celebrations because a subset of the population does not meet public safety guidelines is frustrating and insidious. Some celebrations, such as birthday parties, can be organized via video chat. While not quite the same, there is too much promise that next year will be better. My real feeling with irresponsible individuals is their destruction of once-in-a-lifetime events. I'm only going to get married once. Both my mentors welcomed new babies this month, and two friends lost their grandfather and grandmother. These events, both happy and sad, cannot be stalled until 2021. In bad times there is a tendency to rank mourning: If you need to switch to online learning, at least you haven't lost your job; Or if you lost your job, at least you don't go through a fan. The misconception of the coronavirus pandemic ruined my marriage. I admit I'm lucky to still be able to marry in full view of loved ones, even though we are physically scattered all over the country. I'm one of the lucky ones who's in good health and who can make a blow-up party for a one-year anniversary, but it didn't have to be like that. I also want to make a complaint to others who are not fortunate as I am, those who can't just push the big parties on to the next year or those for being careless at the population level literally a situation in life or death. Staying home is an act of compassion. Wearing masks, if you have to go out, has become a marker of empathy. Removing from the company of others, if you suspect that you are sick or have been in contact with someone who is ill, has a resonance of benefits for the whole community. Because even if you're not planning a wedding, you're expecting a child, or graduating from college this year, your neighbor or best friend or stranger could be at the bus stop. You can predict when someone will die, or when you may need to undergo immune-compromised surgery. Support your small role in overseeing this pandemic so that everyone can participate fully in these events in life in 2021. Related Content Want to Read More With Johns Hopkins School of Medicine?
